The top metrics your nonprofit should track for fundraising.

Less is more when it comes to collecting data.

Tracking too many fundraising metrics doesn't bring more value; it actually slows decision-making.

Here are the data points your nonprofit should be focusing on.

Data that tells you what's coming up

These help your org plan for future fundraising goals and expecations:

- Active donor appeals
- Anticipated gift amounts and their timing
- Funding priorities

Data to help you engage donors

Tracking these can help you prioritize your donor outreach:

- How the donor has engaged with you previously and how often they give
- Their relationships with donors and community members
- Recent interactions you've had with them

Data to find out what's working

This helps you measure if your fundraising efforts are paying off or if they need a change:

- Total dollars raised
- Donor growth
- First-time donor conversions
- Major donor activity
- Year-over-year performance

Build a plan to get the right data

1. Understand what data your leaders need to make decisions.
2. See what data already exists and if there are inconsistencies.
3. Define each metric clearly and figure out how often they need to be reported on.
4. Assign someone to each metric for accountability.

Learn more about what data points your nonprofit should track to help reach your fundraising goals.

candid.org/blogs | link in caption